Terpene talk

Inside the plant's trichomes (the microscopic glands that contain the plant's oils!), you'll find terpenes, the aromatic centers of the flower. These volatile compounds degrade and evaporate at certain temperatures, meaning care from harvest to pressing to puffing, matters.

Puffing on the peak of freshness: a guide

Tips for consciously enjoying the plant in its purest form, preserving the cultivar's integrity as nature intended.

Live rosin vs live resin vs distillate

Breaking down live rosin, rosin, live resin, and distillate to educate consumers on the differences.

"Live" refers to when material is freshly frozen upon harvest, skipping the drying and curing phase that flower you smoke undergoes. This is a process that captures the plant's terpene profile at the peak of its freshness, as terpenes degrade during drying and curing.

Live Rosin refers to oil extracted from the "live" flower material using only temperature and pressure. Rosin refers to oil extracted from dried and cured material using only temperature and pressure.

Live Resin refers to oil extracted from "live" flower material using solvents, such as butane, ethanol, or alcohol to agitate the trichomes, and extract their oil. Meaning residuals can be leftover.

Distillate refers to oil that has been heavily refined through high heat and multiple processing steps to isolate cannabinoids, often stripping away the plant's natural terpene profile entirely.

Clean the palate

To enjoy the cultivar's flavor to the max, clean your palate before the first puff by drinking water, avoiding strong foods, and flavored drinks beforehand.

No blinkers

Save your blinkers for lower quality distillate and puff on Trichome's premium live rosin with slow, smooth draws for maximum flavor.
